SENATOR BOHLKE: Currently, there is one which I think you're probably getting to, would be Petersburg. But they have gone instead to a vote of the people. My communication with Petersburg is actually they are...they do not like the loan part. And so I'm, you know, I...I can't speak for Petersburg, I'm not sure they're going for a levy to the people locally. But that was the unique circumstances that...circumstances out there now. Like I said, the only other ones I could see in the future would be if a new school district, private school opened in a district, and you lost a large number of employees, or if a factory that happened to be in a community that employed a large number of people, and we have seen some instances of that, would close, and there would be a significant loss in the number of students that may impact that school. There may be others, but those are the only ones I can think of, Senator Raikes.

SENATOR RAIKES: Okay, thank you. To continue with one additional question now. This provision would deal with what used to be called the respin and is now called the audit. Is that correct? We once certified state aid, and then the following year there's an audit conducted to see if, in fact, the certification parameters were realized. And, if they weren't realized, then there's adjustment made.

SENATOR BOHLKE: Senator Raikes, I call it an audit. I think the Department of Education still calls it the respin, but I like the word audit, yes.

SENATOR RAIKES: Okay. And the items or parameters that would be affected in this audit or respin would not include valuations. Is that right, property valuations?

SENATOR BOHLKE: That's correct.

SENATOR RAIKES: Okay, and it would include such things as student numbers or possibly, and this actually would be covered under another feature of the bill, errors, I guess, really wouldn't be involved in this. Is that correct?
